The browser is similar to Firefox for Windows, but it has an interface suitable for mobile devices. For example, you can open pages simultaneously as tabs that you can access by tapping the number icon next to the address bar. This is an intuitive way to control multiple tabs without filling the screen. Like the desktop version, Firefox includes extension support for Android or add-ons as they are known in this case. They allow you to get your Android browser to work with more features. What makes it different from other mobile browsers? Different Add-ons are great for customized firefox. Like the desktop version, the diversity of add-ons can improve web browsing or add social media features. Other useful tools that have previously built-in Firefox for Android include slick bookmarks and the home page that shows the top sites you have visited. Previously cash in cash can be viewed offline. Zoom or double-tap for quick/outlook by making page navigation effortless. Another clean feature of Firefox for Android is its support for Firefox Sync. This gives you access to all bookmarks, history, and running tabs for the desktop version of Firefox, so you don't have to worry about entering addresses manually. Firefox for Android allows you to send videos to Chromecast and Roku and undo the closed tab. You can also list recently closed tabs, close all tabs at once, and there's a quick switch-to-tab option.
